Groom and Groom, as you stand here together today to exchange your vows and commit to each other in marriage. You come each as your own person and as the couple, you have grown into over the past 23 years. You both understand the meaning of commitment not just to each other but to the relationship you share. The two of you have found your own place in the world. You both know that no matter what the outside world may say to you, you will each hold the other safe in the protection of your love.

Your wedding vows are a public proclamation of you love for one another, so I ask you...

Do you each promise to bring who you are into this marriage and leave behind that which you are not, to honor who you are together and allow your hearts to lead you?

Will you keep each other safe and be the strength for one another?

Will you love and stand by each other in blue skies?

Will you shelter one another should the skies turn stormy?

If you ever find your relationship barren will you allow a new dream to be born?

Groom, do you take Groom to be your husband, no matter what?

Groom, do you take Groom to be your husband, no matter what?
